

Bachelor of Science in Human Resources Management

Available Fall 2005

In today's tight labor market, human resources professionals need to have a fundamental understanding of employee relations, staffing, training and development, compensation management, organizational development, legal and compliance issues and human resources strategies. Franklin's Human Resources Management major addresses all of these areas and more, preparing undergraduate students for a successful career in human resources. The Program's curriculum combines theory with real-life scenarios, incorporating current industry practice with traditional HR concepts. Students also develop the oral and written skills, as well as the critical thinking and reasoning as required for human resources professionals.

How it Works

Franklin University, an innovator in learning for the non-traditional student for more than 100 years, has created a unique alliance with community colleges* that is changing access to higher education by providing students with easy access to an online bachelor's degree.

The Bachelor of Science degree program has three components:

- Earn an associate's degree (or at least 60 semester hours and a GPA of 2.5)
- Take preparatory "bridge" courses at your community college while taking online classes through Franklin
- Receive your bachelor's degree from Franklin after completing a minimum of 40 semester credit hours online

*The term community college refers to community, technical and other two-year institutions.

Easy Access

As an adult learner, you may wish to expand or enhance your education to increase your career potential, however, due to personal or professional considerations, or time or location constraints, pursuing a traditional on-campus classroom-focused program is inconvenient. Franklin University's online classes are conveniently accessible via the Internet when you want them — anytime, anywhere. In addition, these programs are designed for people like you, who are self-motivated, goal-driven and possess the initiative and maturity to take charge of their learning process.
